PREFACE.

THE principal object of this work is to supply a defect which is daily experienced. Those who wish to discover the armorial insignia, or crest, of any family, are obliged to have recourse to ponderous volumes, where they seldom find more than obscure descriptions, requiring one versed in the science of heraldry to understand, and most frequently the object of their search is entirely wanting. Thus it has been deemed expedient to comprise that portion of armorial bearings in more general use, within moderate bounds, and adapt it for the use, either of those who amuse themselves with such studies, or for that of professional people, who have always been at a loss for one of the like nature.

THE principal sources from which the substance of the work has been derived, are those heraldic treatises the most esteemed. Some rare manuscripts, in public libraries, have been of great utility: Private repositories have likewise contributed to it, and some individuals have themselves communicated their crests. Notwithstanding all these circumstances, and all the care and attention that have been bestowed on the work, several errors and inaccuracies may appear. In a few instances the figure of the crest may have originally been erroneous, but in many more the motto; and the error is retained here, not deeming it justifiable to alter them, but rather to preserve both the figure and the spelling, which has been hereditary in families. Innumerable crests and mottos are chosen by persons ignorant of heraldry or languages; and the radical errors cannot now be corrected. Several of the crests differ a little in description from the figures, which is partly intentional, and partly accidental. For example, they are commonly engraved proper, without the heraldic tinctures, the execution of which would be attended with infinite difficulty. But this (if it is an error) can easily be rectified in painting the crest, the tinctures or colours being all described. Some more trifling differences occur, which it is needless to specify.

THE historical introduction collects together some of the peculiarities relative to heraldry, while it engrosses as connected therewith such a history of the CREST as has with considerable difficulty been accomplished; the subject being of obscure origin and irregular practice, and all that has been written concerning it scattered in detached treatises. Besides, some curious and uncommon manuscripts, most of the eminent heraldic authors, and many on various branches of antiquities, have been consulted. The works of Menestriar, Montfacon, Favine, Segar, Edmondson, Mackenzie, Nisbet, Dallaway, Strutt, and Grose, proved particularly useful.

THE importance of family prerogative has infinitely diminished: the reasons are obvious. Anciently it was the object of general concern; now, perhaps, men are occupied by things more important. Yet, it must be admitted, that it is interesting when some memorial of antiquity is preserved; and the knowledge of it must not only be grateful to individuals, but useful in a country where the wisdom of the people has established a difference in rank.

Digitized by Google

The only point relative to dignity, that can be said at this time to be fully ascertained, is precedency; such, at least, is the general opinion. However, it is liable to dispute in some instances, and particularly with regard to those who hold temporary offices, and the rank of their children. There is no good reason why the latter should rank higher than if their father had no office whatever.

INTRODUCTION.

In a retrospect of the manners of ancient times, numerous important changes present themselves to view. Whole nations have passed away, and others have come in their place; and with these have new ideas, new customs, and new improvements arose. Even in the short compass of human life, a succession of novelties appear: what is esteemed by a series of generations falls into disrepute, is held in disdain, and at length totally forgotten. Yet it must be acknowledged that, although continual alterations are going on, and innovations sometimes will rapidly extend, material changes are slowly accomplished; and a custom firmly established is eradicated only by imperceptible degrees.

The first approach to civilization is the distinction of ranks. So necessary is this to the welfare and existence of society, that, without it, anarchy and confusion must prevail. But, when once received as the characteristic of merit, it is not only anxiously preserved for the advantage of a community, but eagerly aspired to as an enviable mark of pre-eminence. Hence have magistracy, military office, and titles originated. There are few departments of civil government, in nations emerging from barbarity; the number who could enjoy command was little greater, and to render titles universal would have depreciated the value of what was estimable in proportion to its rarity. Therefore a people, arrived at a certain degree of cultivation, would naturally look around for some less important means of distinguishing merit. These have been of various descriptions: many are lost by the lapse of time; and among those of a similar nature transmitted to us, may perhaps be placed heraldic emblems. We are necessitated to admit, however, that the origin of heraldry is obscure: there is no absolute evidence that its symbols were invented for the purpose of honourable distinctions: nay, it is not impossible that they might be the offspring of some simple and trivial peculiarity. Whether it was so or not, we have little inducement, in this place, to inquire; but, once adopted, they supplied the want of personal honours, and were employed as a sign of pre-eminence.

From the rude representation of particular figures, heraldry gradually became a science; and it was cultivated with the utmost zeal and attention, as one of the most important nature. A certain court was instituted, where every case relating to prerogative, to infringement of right, or the usurpation of undue pretensions, might be tried. To preserve heraldic cognizances pure and uncontaminated was committed to officers of exalted station, and the royal mandate was frequently interposed to testify the celebrity in which the science was held.

In an early stage, heraldic emblems were characteristic of the bearer; and when they came into a more improved state, they formed a conspicuous portion of the pageants which constituted the delight of the middle ages; cavalcades or processions, tilts, tournaments; and all that was relative to chivalry. This was a consequence flowing from the disposition and propensities of the people: their opinions were directed in a certain channel; and before the progress of learning, which partakes little of bustle and tumult, the chief sources of fame were valour and personal address.—The quiet, the comforts, and security of civilization are only of late introduction. But war was the nursery of our ancestors; joustings, tournaments, and feats of personal strength, their amusements. Romantic expeditions, undertaken in the search of fame, or of adventures where prowess might be displayed, probably contributed effectually to the diffusion of heraldry, and those, in particular, which were for the vindication of imaginary injuries to the Christian religion; for, while the cross was displayed on his banner, or his shield, the enthusiastic warrior swore a solemn oath to conquer or to die. A valorous knight, cased in complete armour, was known in foreign nations by his shield and his crest: the figures of which these were composed at once ascertained his country, and the family to which he belonged.

We are unacquainted both with the country where armorial bearings were invented, and the peculiar mode of using them. But from what we know of their history, after they came into more general use, it is evident they were borne by none excepting persons of rank, or those who had signalized themselves in arms: and even after the strictness, in this respect, had relaxed so far as to permit merchants to assume such distinctions, the figures which they were allowed belonged to none of those that could be denominated real heraldic emblems. Certain ordinances were made, regulating the mode of bearing arms, and who were entitled to bear them. No branch of a family might assume the arms of his chief without proper differences. To assume another's arms, or any part of them, was unlawful. The lower classes were rigorously prohibited to use arms; and those articles, on which they were found painted or engraven, were confiscated to the king. In short, heraldry was reduced to a systematic form: it was recognized by the legislature as part of the privileges of the subject, and penal statutes applied to preserve it free from encroachment and alteration.

We are told of the various modes in which a person might acquire right to arms; and although they are partitioned into numerous branches, all may be limited to descent and merit. Ignoble birth was considered as a stain almost indelible; hardly could virtue or courage wipe it away: It was an evil ever prominent to view, and an insurmountable obstacle to elevation in the state. Illustrious parentage, on the other hand, constituted the very basis of honour: it communicated peculiar rights and privileges, to which the meaner born man might not aspire. It was a sure path to celebrity; and the partiality with which it was beheld rendered its prerogatives the first objects of ambition. One of the most especial was the privilege of a gentleman to vindicate his honour by single combat. We have many exceptions of those to whom this was not permitted. So rigidly was the equality of rank maintained, that it was even doubted whether a peer of inferior degree could challenge one whose title was superior to his own. In another respect, the privilege of birth was almost as great. At tournaments, those festivals of arms and magnificence, where nations gloried in owning the victor, none were allowed to contend for fame but those who could prove their gentility by several descents. Knighthood was equivalent to the highest honour that could be conferred. Sovereigns esteemed it an addition to sovereignty itself. A solemn and impressive ceremony took place at the degradation of knights: Their arms were rent asunder, their spurs cut off, and themselves ignominiously banished from the society of the noble and brave.

ARMORIAL bearings consist in the shield and its accessories. These are generally reckoned ten in number, but they are properly only three; the crest, motto, and supporters; for the rest are accidental, and not universally used. The compartments, coronets, banners, and some insignia of office, cannot be included in a general description, as they are borne only by a few families, and originated from particular events. Neither can the mantlings or helmet be called any part of arms, for they cannot exist independent of the other parts; nor are the manteaux, in which such bearings are frequently placed, any essential part of them. The wreath now belongs to the crest. A full coat of arms consists of the shield, supporters, crest, and motto. The shield and crest are independent of each other; but supporters are dependent on the shield. The motto is applied either to the shield or crest.

WHAT is here to be said shall chiefly be confined to the crest, as that is the only one of the accessories necessary to be considered in detail: and, in doing this, it will be proper briefly to consider the crest in the place peculiarly appropriated to it.

IF we ascend to the most remote period that historical record can reach, we find this country inhabited by a rude and barbarous people. The chief sources of national prosperity, agriculture and traffic, were little known. The progress to improvement was retarded both by internal discord, and the petty principalities into which the island was divided. Probably the principal occupation of the natives, as with those of a similar condition, consisted in war and hunting. They seem to have had very imperfect defensive armour, and their weapons to have been such as are common in countries in a state next to barbarity. By the gradual introduction of the arts, and by conquest, complete armour was adopted; and the part formed to protect the head undoubtedly must have been attended to, as of the greatest consequence. But it was long of receiving that improved figure of which it was afterwards discovered to be susceptible. At first, the helmet appears to have been a conical cap, which came no lower than the ears, and even when it was curved to fit the head, it is likely that part of the face was unprotected. The form gradually improved, though, at the same period, it is to be found very various. It was flat, conical, curved, and bell-shaped, with a few holes before for the admission of light and air; and it probably joined to the mail covering the neck. The helmet also consisted of a reticulated work like the ring-mail: but it was at last formed of steel plates, and a great improvement introduced in applying a moveable visor. A bever was also part of the most perfect helmets. Anciently the front, or visor, seems to have opened horizontally on hinges like a door; afterwards it was constructed to lift up and down.

It is said, that the materials of which a helmet consisted, denoted the rank of the wearer. The peculiar form of the visor has long been applied to the same purpose. Those of princes and peers have bars, but those of inferior degrees have none. The helmet of a sovereign is represented with the bars in front; that of a peer with them in profile: The helmet of a knight has the visor open; that of an esquire or gentleman is close. We are told that the number of bars must also be taken into account; this, however, seems to have been less attended to in Britain. A sovereign had eleven, and each of the five degrees of peerage a number peculiar to itself.

There was a projection over the top of some helmets, the better to secure the head, which was called the crest; and from this, it has been concluded, arose the first hint of that crest with which we are acquainted. Yet this, like numerous other points of antiquarian research, is involved in uncertainty. It must be admitted, that many helmets have none of these projections; which renders it very doubtful whether they could be the real origin of crests.

The crest, in its proper acceptation, is a figure or emblem situated on the top of the helmet; intended, as authors affirm, to make a commander known to his men in battle; or, if it represented a monster, or other tremendous object, to render him terrible and warlike. Whether it was truly meant for ornament alone, for a mark of pre-eminence, or an emblem to characterise the leader of a warlike band, may well admit of dispute; for we are no better acquainted with the original use of crests than the original use of arms. Persons of rank, however, sometimes bore similar marks of distinction. The kings of England have certainly wore a coronet, a chaplet of pearls, and other ornaments, in battle. Those who were victorious in tournaments were crowned with a chaplet, garland, or some such ornament, and probably retained it ever afterwards on the helmet. Indeed, this is the origin of many crowned helmets. Plumes of feathers were used both for crest and ornament, and retained long after all the different symbols were common.

After crests became figures, we are informed, they consisted of tin, iron, stiff leather, wood, and the like, being of some substance that could be fashioned into shape, and at the same time light and convenient; and this was fastened to the top of the helmet. When applied to ornament plate, furniture, houses, or tombs, or embroidered on the vestments of the attendants on the great, they were painted exact resemblances of what was designed to be represented, or graven according to the heraldic tinctures. One of the most useful purposes to which both armorial shields and crests were applied, was in the seals appended to written instruments.

The time of introducing crests into Britain is uncertain. In a drawing by Mathew Paris, who lived in the thirteenth century, which relates to a military encounter of Offa, there is a figure with a kind of crest on the helmet. The same figure again occurs in another transaction of that period. However, it is to be doubted whether the author meant to represent ancient armour, or whether he meant that of some time nearer his own era; which is more probable. Drawings or illuminations, relative to ancient events, are always to be cautiously received. It is frequently found that a historian, in illustrating historical facts, does it by elucidations applicable to his own era alone. Hence do the illuminations of cotemporary events become so valuable.

THE great seal of Richard I. who died 1199, first represents the English king with something on his helmet resembling a plume of feathers. There are several figures of him with a round helmet, without any thing above it. Here it may be remarked, in passing, that the chief sources from which heraldic instruction is to be derived are the seals appended to ancient writings, illuminated manuscripts, tombs, and buildings. Seals are the most authentic, but proper illuminations probably afford better illustrations; because seals bear the owner only in a particular character. There is also much inducement to believe, that the same seal hath served for several generations. Tomb-stones bear as near a resemblance to the deceased as it was possible for the sculptor to produce. Frequently there are complete statues, sometimes carvings, and sometimes the figure inlaid in brass. In England, many tombs remain entire; but few are preserved in Scotland. In England, the overthrow of Popery was easily accomplished, and with little disorder, for it was the work of the state. In Scotland, on the other hand, the Reformation was begun by a few turbulent zealots, and put in execution by a riotous mob: Formidable rebellions were raised, and the very safety of the kingdom endangered: All the sacred buildings were pillaged, ransacked, and destroyed. Every vestige of venerable antiquity was ruined, and all images demolished, because they savoured of idolatry and the Roman see. Such are ever the consequences, when a people and their administration are in opposition.

After the reign of Richard I. most of the English kings have crowns on their helmets. On that of Richard II. prior to the year 1377, is a lion on a cap of state. On the helmet of Henry IV. is his crest, as also on the head of his horse.

The first of the Scotish kings, who appears with a crest, is Alexander III. who began to reign 1249. But although we do not find it on the arms or seals of the kings of Scotland, a logical conclusion can hardly be deduced that they had none. On the most ancient Scotish great seal is a figure of the king on horseback, with a helmet open before: this was the general custom over all Europe. The difference in the style of engraving or casting seals was trifling during the twelfth century, previous to which very few are preserved. Alexander II. whose reign began 1214, first has a close helmet with a flat top, but no crest. His successor, Alexander III. has a flat helmet, with a square grated visor, and a crest consisting of a plume of feathers: A plume is likewise on the head of the horse; which before had few trappings, but is now richly caparisoned. The helmet of John Baliol, towards the end of the same century, is flat, without a crest, either on the top, or on the horse. The helmet of Robert I. who began to reign 1306, is round, with a triangular grated visor; a crown above it; and plumes on the horse's head. Ornaments are on the head of Edward Baliol's horse, nearly of the same period. The visor of David, the successor of Robert, is in front, but no crest on the helmet; nor have the two succeeding kings any. James the first, in the beginning of the fifteenth century, has a lion on his helmet for a crest.

DURING the time that the royal seals exhibit no crests, they are not uncommon on those of subjects. Before the year 1286, it is said, the crest, accompanied by the mantlings and wreath, was known in England. In 1292, there is a seal of Hugh le Despencer, with a fan like figure on the helmet and horse's head. These figures are frequently to be met with in the thirteenth century: what they represented, or what was their use, is dubious. A dragon is on the helmet of Thomas Earl of Lancaster, who was beheaded 1322. On the reverse is a swan above the shield, just where a crest should be, on the one, and on the other a lion. We cannot positively affirm whether they were designed for crests, or for figures on which the shield was hung, as was then usual; for it was sometimes suspended from an eagle's beak, around the neck, or hung on a tree.

Much the same may be said of the Scotish crests. Though none are on the great seal, they are frequent on those of subjects. There is a writing of great importance, dated 1371, to which many seals are appended, and most of them have a crest. By the general fashion then prevailing, the shield is in an inclined position with the crest over the higher corner, which, according to heralds, was because the shield was hung, in public, by the left corner during tournaments, to show that the combatant was entitled to bear arms, and enter the lists. Sovereigns alone, and ecclesiastics, had the shield in an erect position; the latter had no proper military ornaments on their shields. On the seal of an Earl of Strathern, attached to a writing 1320, is a shield placed before an eagle, so that the head of the bird appears above like a crest. This, however, rather relates to the custom of suspending the shield over some part of an animal. The helmet of Robert, governor of Scotland, bears a lion 1413, and the same is on that of Murdac, his successor; both being crests.

From the beginning of the fifteenth century crests became universal in Britain. There seems to have been little material difference between those of England and Scotland. It is affirmed, indeed, that crests and supporters were earlier known in the latter kingdom, and that heraldry was preserved in a purer state. However, if it was so, few evidences of the fact remain: we know that the science was assiduously cultivated, and in great estimation in France. The constant intercourse and the permanent amity between that country and Scotland might introduce it in more perfection. Heraldry was reduced to system, and established on a firm basis, in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, if not earlier; and its ordinances embraced an infinity of niceties and peculiarities which are now totally forgot.

At the present day, it is impossible to determine the original purpose either of crests or supporters; for these accessories are attended with more difficulty than any of the rest. There is no satisfactory proof, whether the former were really invented to make the wearer look more formidable in battle, to render him easily recognised by his men, or for mere ornament. At length the crest came to be less a military mark of distinction, and to be considered rather in a civil light: it came to be viewed as an ornamental mark of distinction, if the expression may be used. This must have necessarily been the object, wherever the bearer was, in any of the civil departments of life. The origin of supporters is still more obscure. Some have supposed they were the invention of engravers, merely to fill up the vacant space around the shield, on seals: others think they represent the figures that supported the shield at tournaments. The oldest supporters were uncommon, and little varied. It was otherwise with crests; for there were very considerable differences among the figures borne. Several authors suppose that crests were originally plumes of feathers only. This is not evident; for these most probably were nothing more than a particular kind of crest. The opinion of those, who think crests were common on the heads of horses, is equally liable to dispute; for the number of horses on seals, or elsewhere, that bear them, is very small in comparison to those that have none; and, although they do occur, they are often different from the crest on the helmet. The earliest crests, with which we are acquainted, were, monsters, animals of different kinds, and their parts, branches of trees, plumes of hair or feathers, and the like. As the proper place for this ornament was the helmet, it was certainly a great deviation from heraldic propriety to remove the helmet, and apply the crest to the top of the shield; but this was an ancient practice, if the figures on the reverse of the seals we have just named were meant for crests. There was another deviation still greater; which was, adopting more than one crest. Yet this absurd custom is as old as the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. No crest, properly speaking, should appear without a helmet; and when there were two, which never was a common practice in Britain, they were placed facing each other. On the continent, five or six helmets have been placed over a shield, to denote so many different fiefs,

Our remarks on the modern use of crests, and in times less remote, must necessarily be limited, for the purposes to which they were chiefly applied no longer exist. We ought always to remember that ancient custom must regulate the modern practice in these matters, because the ordinances of armorial bearings were instituted and diversified, when the laws of heraldry and family dignity were zealously cultivated, and when any infringement of them was attended with very considerable hazard.

As it appears that those only could bear arms who were of illustrious descent, or who had obtained them by special favour, the like may be said respecting the crest. It was an honourable emblem of distinction, which frequently characterised the bearer as much as his arms, and was sometimes constituted by royal grant. In some countries, it was even more esteemed a mark of honour than the shield: but in Britain the shield has been judged more honourable, and one with crest, motto, and supporters, the most honourable. It is asserted, that crests were of particular use in tilts and joustings, where no shield was borne: and thus distinguished the owner, who would otherwise have been known by his armorial bearings.

Thus, in the representation of ancient encounters, the combatants appear with enormous crests, almost as large as the helmet itself. Those knights and gentlemen, who repaired to tournaments, were distinguished by their crests. Indeed, to bear arms of some kind was indispensable, as none were deemed worthy to partake of such fetes, unless of undoubted pretensions by birth or merit. Crests were likewise embroidered on the vestments of the attendants at the processions of parliament, coronations, and public solemnities; and they were engraven, carved, or painted on property in the same manner as coats of arms.

Most heraldic authors are of opinion that the crest is not hereditable like the arms of a family, and that, for this reason, every successor may assume a new one for himself. Probably it might be a common practice in other kingdoms, but it has never been general with us, at least of more recent date. And it is well known that the crest of many families is esteemed as distinctive as the bearings in the shield, and has been transmitted from one generation to another for several centuries. It is not unlikely that one source of the immense variety of crests has arose from the younger branches of a family retaining the paternal coat, and assuming a different crest: and this may have given occasion to admit, that the crest may be changed, though arms may not. A preferable method of distinguishing these younger branches is to retain the crest, and put a mark of cadency in the shield. Crests appear with a mark of cadency on them. It is unusual to adopt this mode of distinction here.

The figures in the shield are generally thought to have been rude representations of the implements necessary in war, or relative to some of those which were used at tournaments and festivals. Therefore, by the stricter rules of heraldry, none of the armorial bearings, but what were in the shield, were called honourable, and the crest, motto, and supporters, and the rest, were judged merely ornamental. In most antiquarian researches, men have been animated by a kind of enthusiasm which has obscured the faculties of discrimination and reasoning; and an error conceived by one, is adopted and propagated by the next who acquires it, without the smallest anxiety to discover the truth. Thus it has been with the history of heraldic emblems. Unquestionably it is a point of importance in heraldry, whether the crest was ever any thing else than an ornament; and it must be acknowledged, that it has always been recognised in different lights: for, although it might be considered ornamental, it was uniformly esteemed an honourable symbol. In addition to crests being the subject of royal grant, we have instances of them being assumed and confirmed in commemoration of warlike deeds, or other events, and retained as honourable; which is testified by the bearings of many old families. Some were taken to preserve the fame of a progenitor, and some were allusive to dignified offices. Several have been granted for certain services; and others were relative to a family name, which implied something martial or illustrious. Part of the royal crest has been granted to subjects for signal services, and the same has been done with the royal supporters. There are examples of one person assigning his own crest to be borne by another. Therefore it cannot be said that a crest is a mere ornament, otherwise the mantlings and wreath might be viewed of equal importance, which has never been the case; and, when once established in a family, it ought not to be changed more than arms themselves. Nay, it has been so much considered a mark of distinction, that different sovereigns have made additions to the crests of their subjects.

Digitized by Google

CRESTS are often part of the bearings in the shield: sometimes part of the supporters, but more usually unconnected with either. According to MENESTRIER, they cannot consist of any of the honourable parts of blason, such as the pale fess or cheveron.

THOUGH the privilege of using armorial ensigns was at first limited to few, gradual encroachments were made upon it. That anxiety for distinction and prerogative, which will ever characterise mankind, by degrees brought them into universal use; and every person, from an emperor down to an artizan, had something of the kind, founded on real or fictitious claims. All trades, professions, and societies, temporal and ecclesiastical, from the keeper of the keys of St Peter, down to the humble monk, claimed particular arms, and, along with them, in general, a crest. For the emblems borne by ecclesiastics in reality supplied the place of it. And this seems faithfully transmitted to us; for every man, no matter of what rank or condition, deems himself entitled to a coat-armorial, and a crest: pretensions too ridiculous to merit a moment's notice in confutation. Another cause of the immense variety of crests arises from the innumerable pretenders to armorial distinction appropriating an emblem formerly unknown.

Digitized by Google

It is most probable, if we may trust to the monuments preserved, that the crest anciently consisted of some plain and simple device, or what was applicable to the assumer only. Thus we find an eagle's head, a bird's wing, a peacock's tail, a banner, and the like. But so immeasurable a deviation from this practice has ensued, that it is impossible to give any rule for the subsequent assumption of crests, if the passion for it shall continue. It seems universally admitted, that one may not only assume any emblem or device for his crest, according to the dictates of fancy, but that he may change it as often as he pleases, without any reason assigned. Hence, as well as from other sources, do we see such an amazing variety of crests. An English author professes his design to enumerate fifty thousand coats-armorial and crests. Thus do many persons of different names bear similar crests, and as many of the same name bear different ones. Some of the most eminent heralds maintain, that they should consist of figures that may be carried on the helmet of a warrior; and that unstable things, or such as cannot be supported from below, are improper. But there is no such rule or limitation now practised: Every day we behold the most uncommon, complicated, confused, and unintelligible crests, chosen without design or reason. Innumerable figures appear, which have no relation to any known object; and if they were at first (and that at a period not very remote) intended for some emblematical purpose, it is now inexplicable. A clergyman has a Bible, and an attorney a quill: nay, people have gone so far as to assume saws and axes, which professional absurdity was known in France in the thirteenth century. If a possibility remains of suggesting a rational crest, it will be, in the first place, to adopt the most ancient one known to belong to the name; and if neither name nor crest appear in history, to take a simple figure, and a motto applicable to it. By this means will customary inconsistency partly be avoided, and confusion in some measure corrected. The mode of wearing it is either simply on a wreath, or more properly on a helmet, with the wreath interposed, and the motto above. The former is the more general practice; but the latter unquestionably the most proper.

Enormous plumes and mantlings formerly adorned the helmet. Thus, in the sixteenth century, we have an illumination of the famous Sir David Lindsay's arms by himself; and as he was Lyon King at Arms in Scotland, it may be considered an appropriate example. The helmet is close, and in profile: it is surmounted by enormous plumes, black and red; and the wreath, it is to be remarked, consists of the same colours as the plumes. Above the helmet is the crest, which is a heart transfixed by a dart.—Soon afterwards the plumes on the helmet seem to have been discontinued. The wreath, it is said, should consist of the two principal tinctures in the shield; and the same thing must be observed with regard to the mantlings.

As the practice of several centuries has attached the wreath to the crest and helmet, or to the crest alone, it cannot be considered a separate and independent exterior ornament; it is rather an accessory of the crest. At the same time the wreath is sometimes removed, if the crest is on a coronet, or a cap of state. The wreath was a cord tied round, or fastened on, the helmet. It consisted of different colours, either according to the fancy of the bearer, according to the tinctures of his arms, or such as were chosen by some favourite lady. Different uses are ascribed to this accessory.

It is generally asserted that women may not bear crests; and the reason assigned is, because,

Digitized by Google

in ancient times, they could not wear a helmet. But a gross inconsistency immediately becomes evident; for the heralds who are of this opinion undoubtedly forget that a woman was as incapable of using a shield as of bearing a helmet. However, the instances of women bearing coats-armorial are innumerable, and even of the most ancient date: a fact particularly illustrated by their seals, which are still preserved. The seals of men about the end of the eleventh, and beginning of the twelfth century, exhibit the figure of the owner cased in complete armour, and carrying a lance; or, if he was entitled to it, a banner or pennon: He is mounted on a horse commonly at full speed. The horse, of later eras, is caparisoned and covered with the armorial bearings of the rider, as is his own cloke above his armour, or the armour itself. Sometimes the horse has the mail then used for protection. On the reverse is a coat of arms in a shield. The seals of women sometimes bear the figure of a woman mounted, but the horse at a much more moderate pace; or she is represented standing, and a shield pendent from her right hand; or she merely holds some emblem in her right hand, and a bird on her left. There are some seals of men with a bird perched on the hand; probably a falcon, the emblem of gentility. On the reverse of the seal is the woman's coat of arms, and frequently the crest. Afterwards a lozenge was adopted instead of a shield, and is still retained. Thus there is just the same inconsistency in a woman bearing arms, as in her bearing a crest. If a woman may inherit a title, represent a family, and if she may bear the arms of that family, why may she not also use the crest? It is very true, if ancient custom remained entire, and if heraldry were really so pure, that its emblems represented existing figures, that these figures were implements of war, and could be used by men alone, it would be absurd to put them in the hands of women: but it is very different from women adopting them as a mark of distinction; and now that the crest is viewed in the same light, or relative to the name of a family, it is difficult to assign any sound reason why a woman may not bear it, if it is admitted that she is entitled to arms; a fact which has never been called in question. As to the peculiar mode of bearing these arms, enough will be found concerning it in the different works on heraldry; and it would be deviating in some respect from the subject to consider it here. Married women and widows bear the same arms as their husbands; though several authors are of opinion, that the crest, motto, and supporters, should be laid aside by the latter. If the husband bore any mark of hereditary dignity, his widow retains it. Thus dowager peeresses by marriage bear coronets, and the widows of Nova Scotia baronets may encircle their arms with the ribbon, and append the badge of the order. However, it is to be doubted, whether they may wear the badge on their persons, as some authors suppose. Peeresses, indeed, at public ceremonies, where singular pomp is to be displayed, have coronets suitable to their dignity; and the wives of knights of the garter used to have the insignia of that order embroidered on dresses appropriate to the ceremony.

The proper position of the crest is, by commoners, above the helmet, and the helmet resting on the shield. Peers carry the coronet on the shield, and the helmet above the coronet. Therefore a coronet above a helmet is no mark of dignity. This, indeed, is a kind of inconsistency; for where could a coronet be wore, except above the helmet? Probably it has been conceived that, both at once being incompatible, the military emblem has the highest place, as it is surmounted by a crest. When the crest and coronet are detached from the full coat-armorial, it is said the coronet should be put over the crest. It has been the practice of some families, though very few, to put a coronet for a crest, to have a hand grasping at a coronet, or a coronet with something issuing from it; and all to evince pretensions to peerage. Such practices are to be reprobated: they neither serve the intended purpose, nor any other; for, if there are pretensions, the crest is not the proper place to put them. They have no meaning whatever, therefore the custom is absurd: it seems as if it arose only from the vanity of putting a coronet over arms, when there should be none.

The motto and device are so nearly allied, that we shall find it difficult to draw a proper line of distinction: indeed, for all the difference which is known at the present day, it may almost be said, that both imply the same thing. According to heraldic writers, the motto, strictly so called, is a sentence, word, or expression, without any allusion whatever to the armorial bearing; when it relates to the arms, or affords an explanation of some part or other, then they call it a device. Both kinds are in general use in Britain. There was anciently known, over all Europe, the cry of war; and many of these cries have become mottos. Sometimes there were national cries, being invocations of the tutelar saint, the name of the sovereign, or the like: and there were private cries or exhortations for the different chieftains, and their respective bands. Thus they might formerly be public and private; but all are now private.

The variety of mottos is very great; but they seem to have been seldomer changed than the crest. The meaning of an infinite number is now lost; consequently they appear unintelligible. Some allude to historical events, some to public affairs, and others to private occurrences. Several relate to a family name, or the martial deed of a progenitor. Many families have two mottos; one allusive to the arms, the other a sentiment expressive of virtue or valour. Mottos are now so common, that no shield or crest is without them. Their universal introduction is more recent, for they were by no means general of old. It would occupy too much time to trace their history here. It has frequently engaged the attention of antiquarians, when employed on the cries of war and device.

The crest and motto are usually borne together. The practice of encircling the arms with it on a garter is incorrect, for we never read of the motto on a garter; on the contrary, it is uniformly inscribed on a scroll or pennon. Inscribing it on a garter has too much the imitation of knights of the garter. Certain families have retained the same motto for centuries; others have changed it. However, there seem to be the same reasons against changing the motto as against changing the crest.

In treating of the motto, as a device, much might be said upon the subject. The device was a private emblem, and the motto a public one. Devices have been common in all ages, and in all countries; and, as every person, male and female, used them, they were innumerable. At tournaments was the chief display of devices; there they were borne by the combatants, or embroidered on the vestments of their attendants: and they generally related to some private occasion. They were exhibited on the shield and helmet. Formerly it was not unusual to assume a temporary device, adapted to a particular occasion, instead of the proper crest. We find numerous instances of this at fetes and tournaments. After the pageantry or solemnity ended, the crest was resumed. But it is more than probable that many of these devices, being retained, became the permanent crests of those to whom they belonged. And most of the mottos now known may have originated from this custom. Devices consisted in the emblem alone, or accompanied by an inscription, or in letters only. Little attention has been paid to these devices in Britain, in comparison to what has been observed on the continent. It was one peculiar province of ingenuity to invent devices, and a far more difficult one to decypher them. Whole volumes of these enigmas are preserved, for it was once a most favourite study. Indeed, whatever tended to dark and mysterious purposes, and could be understood only by a few, has always been more favoured than the rest.

PERHAPS, in these desultory remarks, a few observations may be expected on the right of bearing armorial ensigns. Certain it is, that although too much latitude has crept in, some privileges are still preserved. No man of sense will be an advocate for the creation of prerogative; neither will he desire the abolition of rank. Therefore a middle course must be pursued; that is, the strict limitation of prerogative to those only who are entitled to it. It has long been settled, by common concurrence, that many subjects have no right to bear arms. And many can use them only in a particular style. The chief question seems to respect supporters; for one who can use these may wear all the other armorial ensigns. Peers of all the five gradations may bear supporters. It is said the baronets of Nova Scotia may also use them; but that the baronets of England may not. However, the right of the former may be called in question. The chiefs of families also are entitled to them. It is not evident that the eldest sons of peers have right to supporters; and office can bestow no right of this kind. Thus the title to this distinction is confined to few. There are several examples of persons, in settling an estate, ordaining the successor to assume the coat-armorial; and this most absurd injunction has really been complied with. So that we see two full coats of arms borne by the same person; who has no more title to them than to the arms of the sovereign: for these ensigns can flow from the king alone, and they cannot be arrogated by every one who thinks so highly of his own descent or merit.

The total change of the military system, the disuse of warlike sports, and the general improvement of all civilized nations, have tended to lessen the importance of heraldry and family

dignity. The implements of war represented by heraldic emblems are lost in antiquity. Shields, helmets, and crests, are now unknown; and all other armour entirely laid aside. Nothing ought more to excite our admiration, than how it was retained so long, and how our forefathers could not only support such cumbrous loads of iron, but be active under them. Single combat, as an appeal to justice, has long been at an end. Tilts, tournaments, and running at the ring, have given place to more refined and social amusements, though they may be less manly or martial. Pageants, funeral pomp, and processions, are rare and unusual exhibitions. In short, the general bent of men is turned from the ideal to the useful. Such are some of the causes why heraldry is now less cultivated than before, and why family distinctions are less important. And these causes center in two; the one, because heraldry and family dignity are more rarely called into notice; the other, because the general attention of mankind is diverted towards much more interesting objects.—Still there are cogent reasons why these things should be held in estimation. - Heraldry is a sort of historical record of those eminent characters on whom such distinctions were conferred: it is a memorial of antiquity. Family is but a name indeed; yet it is such a name as cannot be purchased, and what many would give any consideration to obtain, for the stigma of ignoble birth is not yet wholly forgotten. Therefore it must be valuable. What is it to a weak or intemperate man that he is of eminent rank? or what is it to one depraved that he is of illustrious descent? In the one case, we are reminded of human frailty, and in the other we must lament the want of hereditary virtue. On this account, the value which we would stamp on birth must necessarily be attended by merit. A virtuous and respectable member of society will not be the less esteemed that his ancestors were noble; nay, it will add to the lustre of his name. And if a name of that description has been transmitted to us from antiquity, it is entitled to reverence. Thus it is that heraldry, in its most moderate use, ought not to be contemned: it is one method of distinguishing rank, and of preserving the memory of the illustrious.
